I had a case Luv. Boston Housing Court, SSC no 7670 for oral argument on June 28. Z was in the gallery while you presented your case. Shortly before you did, a gentleman came in with 2 young girls and together sat in the row before us - I assume ~~that~~ the gentleman was your brother with 2 little girls of his.

I had seen a few cases like yours and Paul said. Admittedly it is daunting ^{to} task to overturn a criminal conviction after appeal is exhausted - in legal world, it is called "take a second bite at the apple" and disfavoured. But more fundamentally you and others similarly situated are bumping your heads against the wall, and take a wrong approach. SJC, like Appeals Court, is an appellate court, meaning it only deal with law (~~and~~ ^{correcting} misunderstanding of law, applying law incorrectly, etc. by a trial court). It is a trial court which finds fact, either by a judge or if you so choose, by a jury. One trial court find facts, an appellate court is bound by that fact. You're in the wrong court for a wrong cause of action. You cannot even sue under 42 USC § 1983 (Civil Rights Act of 1964). See Heck v Humphrey (1994) 512 US 477. You may seek habeas corpus, see Bray v Gray (1991) 500 US 99. But be careful! Once you pursue habeas, there is no guarantee for discovery. And once that route is exhausted, you will have no further recourse. To read these cases it have go to www.findlaw
